The presence of so many emigrants in the cities also goes to swell the elements of disorder both directly and indirectly. Here we are far from casting any reflection upon our adopted citisens, indeed, we only do them justice when we say that in the late crisis they were even more ready than those of native birth in the maintenance of order. But it is plain that our surplus population is increased by thousands of foreigners who have no means of living but manual labor and who are not yet accustomed to the control of the civil power alone. What is necessary is to remove them to the interior; to establish them upon the Land; to convert them into citizens having a real Land; to convert them into citizens having a real and tangible stake in the general welfare. Not that we know of any such person having been engaged in the Ristof Thursday, the shame of which was brought onus as we believe by American bullies; but while there is a large poor foreign population in New-York, there is a material for disorder which for every reason should not remain—
